You will be asked for your McGill email address and password when off-campus.
Type your keywords in the search box. You can also create a more specialized search by adding search boxes, in order to separate out your concepts, using the plus sign.

The search below will show results that have the word meditation somewhere in the article title, abstract, or keywords, as well as one or more of the words: stress or anxiety or depression.

There are a number of filters that can be used to narrow down the search on the left side of the results page. For example, you can limit to Review in order to get review articles on the topic.
You can click on a title of interest to show the full document details, or click on the name of an author to show more of their works. The arrow next to View abstract will present the abstract with your search terms highlighted.

Find other titles related to this one with the Related documents link.

The Find Full Text button opens up in a separate window and will attempt to provide a link to the article.
In this case, the article is available from the View Full Text link.

If there are no links to the full text, try the Check Holdings in your Library Catalogue button.
Explore the options for saving the records that are of interest, including exporting them to a citation management program, like EndNote, downloading or emailing records to yourself, or creating a bibliography in one of the available styles.

In addition to the document search, there is an author search that will pull up all of the documents by a particular author. Select Authors on the search page. Enter the author’s first and last names, along with their affiliation (optional).
